Ron Liberman was born in what is now Zimbabwe, and has lived and worked in many countries. In 1976 he obtained a B. Sc. degree from the University of London in England and began a career in the computer field. He developed a particular interest in using computers for the typesetting and composition of text, and in his early career he installed classified advertising and editorial systems for major newspapers and magazines.

After coming to Canada in 2004, he initially developed a computer consulting and training business. His interest in immigration work was spurred on by an immigration application for his mother-in-law, who suffered from Alzheimer's disease. After winning her appeal which he conducted himself, Ron decided to pursue a career in this new field.

In 2004, Ron Liberman successfully completed the Immigration Practitioner Course at the University of British Columbia. He is a strong supporter of Regulation, and was one of the first immigration consultants to write the full Membership Exam – he has been a full-time practicing immigration consultant since. He is an active participant in CAPIC and has served as a National Member-at-Large and as a National Education Director.

Owing to his experience of conditions in democratic countries and those ruled despotically by dictators, Ron Liberman is a strong supporter of fairness and accountability in administration as well as believing in transparency, sound financial management, and the importance of standing up for what is right. He views this experience as an asset when representing the interests of CAPIC and CSIC Members in BC.

Ron Liberman is married to Heather, who is a teacher in the Coquitlam school district. He has 4 children and 3 grandchildren.
